Historically, businesses has carried forward in there accounts the cost of work in progress at the balanse sheet date and in the case of professional partnerships, this cost has legitimatley excluded the partner's own time. Some month ago, the Accounting Standards Board issued guidance on the subject of revenue recognition, in other words, when the business should recognize profits on work witch was complete at at it's balance sheet date. This guidance has a major impact on professional partnerships and businesses in the services industry and will mean solicitors accountants architects engineers and anyone whom ordinarily charge for there servces on a time bases will, in most cases, have too recognize the profit on uncomplete work sooner. NCROf coarse, if your account's reconise the profits sooner, youv'e got to paye the tax sooner? Her majesty's revenue and customs wont talk about the isseue write now. They no the accounting profession has done them a good turn and must be rubbing there hands with gleen. Likewise, bank manager's, who will be called on in dew cause to provide larger overdraught facilities to help pay the additional tax due.
